

President's Message

If TWG is to grow and prosper, it has to meet its members' expectations and attempt to satisfy, as best it can, their needs and requirements.

Therefore, it is very important for an organization, with a membership as large and diverse as ours, to provide a wide variety of events and functions so that each member will feel that TWG offers him or her something of particular interest. At the same time, in planning and organizing our activities, we also need to be mindful of and adhere to TWG's stated mission which is to "raise the awareness of Ukrainian political and social issues in the United States and abroad, promote Ukraine's cultural heritage, and support the Ukrainian community with emphasis on the Washington, D.C. area." I feel that we have done an excellent job on both fronts.

In August of last year, we celebrated Ukraine's Independence with an Independence Day Picnic at the Sandy Point State Park. This gave TWG members and their families not only an opportunity to commemorate Ukraine's Independence but also to spend a fun day at the beach.

Shortly thereafter, in October of last year, we had a very successful Leadership Conference, featuring the first public appearance of the recently appointed U.S. Ambassador to Ukraine, Ambassador Carlos Pascual.

The TWG Cultural Fund, in cooperation with the Embassy of Ukraine, is sponsoring a series of five concerts at the Rosslyn Spectrum Theatre during the 2000-2001 season

2000...A Year Of Success

TWG Leadership Looking Forward To New Opportunities

By any measure, 2000 was a good year for TWG and its members.

From the various TWG-sponsored cultural events to TWG's festive Christmas party, last year was filled with many wonderful and successful events.

The TWG Cultural Fund had much to do with TWG's success last year. "We sponsored eight events during the year 2000, from baroque to contemporary music; from an ensemble of members of the Kennedy Center Opera House Orchestra to the Experimental Bandura Trio. For the first time, we hosted a book party and co-sponsored a lecture at the Library of Congress," said Laryssa Courtney, TWG Cultural Fund Director.

"We also launched a concert series, under the stewardship of Cultural Fund committee member Chrystia Sonevytsky and in cooperation with the Embassy of Ukraine, to benefit the Music Conservatory in Lviv. This Benefit Concert Series, featuring artists from Lviv, combines the Cultural Fund's mission to promote Ukrainian culture in the Washington area with help for those who create this culture at its source," she continued.

Taking in the crisp winter evening air, TWG members and friends gathered earlier this year at the National Mall's Sculpture Garden Ice Rink in Washington, D.C., for fun and skating. Homemade medivka made rounds to help keep everyone warm.

Spotlight on Honorary TWG Member Bill

by Orest Deychakiwsky

During the last fifteen years, Bill Courtney, our former Ambassador to Kazakhstan and Georgia and senior director at the National Security Council on Russia, Ukraine and Eurasia, has been no stranger to The Washington Group and the Ukrainian-American community.

Amb. Courtney, who married TWG Cultural Fund Director Larysa Chopivsky last November, has had a long, distinguished and varied career as a diplomat, most of it dealing with the former Soviet Union and political military affairs. Born in West Virginia, Bill graduated from West Virginia University with a B.A. and Brown University with a Ph.D. in economics. After joining the Foreign Service, he served at the American embassies in Moscow and Brasilia, and in assignments at the Department of State and the National Security Council. During the early and mid-1980's he was deputy U.S. negotiator in the Defense and Space Talks, part of the U.S.-Soviet Nuclear and Space Talks in Geneva.

Bill first came to know The Washington Group when the Department of State assigned him to open the first American consulate general in Kyiv. At the Geneva Summit in November 1985, President Reagan and General Secretary Gorbachev agreed that the USSR would open a consulate in New York, and the U.S. a consulate in Kyiv. The idea was to open the U.S. consulate within weeks, but a problem arose. The Soviets refused to allow the United States Government to perform internal or external reconstruction work on the building that would house the consulate. They had carefully prepared it for the Americans' arrival. A stand-off ensued for a year. Finally, Moscow agreed to allow internal reconstruction.

This positive move was then quickly negated by two other developments. The U.S. announced that two Marine Guards may have been spying in our embassy in Moscow. And a U.S. government report was made public indicating that electronic penetration of the new embassy building in Moscow was worse than expected. The bugs rendered it unusable as a facility where sensitive, classified activities could take place. These twin scandals caused the government to halt preparations to open a classified consulate in Kyiv.

Meantime, Bill prepared to go and study Ukrainian language. In early 1986 he addressed the Washington Ukrainian-American community at a well-attended TWG-sponsored evening at Holy Family Ukrainian Catholic Church to discuss plans for the Kyiv consulate. While receiving a warm welcome, Bill recalls also facing tough questioning on the US government's handling of the Medvid and Demjaniuk cases. He came to know the Ukrainian-American community even better, subsequently traveling to over a half-dozen cities on speaking engagements.

In October 1986, Bill took a team of three U.S. physicians and scientists to Kyiv to measure radiation. The U.S. government had told the Soviets it could not open the consulate until it was sure Kyiv was safe in the wake of the Chornobyl disaster. The team took radiation measurements, and bought honey, vegetables, fish, and animal parts at markets. They guarded the samples 24-hours a day to prevent tampering, and carted everything in sealed plastic boxes back to the U.S. for testing. Once they had to shake their tail to collect certain samples to be sure they were genuine; this upset their hosts. Partly because they took samples a half-year after the accident and Kyiv was upwind of Chornobyl initially, U.S. Government testing showed only moderately higher levels of radiation.

While in Kyiv for this visit, the team heard by BBC short wave radio that dissident Irina Ratushinskaya had just been released from prison. Bill knew her address and visited Irina and her husband that evening. They were shocked to be called on so quickly by an American diplomat. Irina asked that Bill relay to President Reagan, then at his second summit, gratitude for his efforts to obtain her release. Bill called the American embassy in Moscow and the

Let the good times roll!
To dispel some of the gray monotony of the mercifully short month of February, TWG invited the acclaimed group "Louisiana Swamp Romp" to perform a program of toe-tapping Zydeco and New Orleans jazz at the Lyceum Theater in Old Town Alexandria on Sunday February 4th at 2:30pm. The program featured traditional Ukrainian melodies with a jazzy twist.

This jazz concert, as well as the next few events the Cultural Fund is planning, are intended as benefits for worthy causes.

As we all know, the difficult economic situation in Ukraine has led to a severe shortage of funds for cultural organizations. Among the hardest hit are music conservatories, such as those in Lviv, Kyiv and Odessa. With this in mind, the TWG Cultural Fund has decided to organize a series of classical music concerts to gather financial assistance for these conservatories to purchase or repair their musical instruments.

The next concert in the series that benefitted the Lviv Conservatory took place on March 5 and featured two graduates of this conservatory: soprano Nusia Bachynska and tenor Ihor Tymbala. They were accompanied by Volodymyr Vynnytsky on the piano. The program reflected the fact that the concert was intended as a tribute to Taras Shevchenko. In 2001

Adieu and Diakuiu to Long Time TWG News Editor Yaro

by Natalie Sluzar

After a six-year stint as editor of TWG News, Yaro Bihun announced his retirement this past December. Mr. Bihun, in effect was not our newsletter's editor, but also reporter, writer, production manager, graphics designer, artistic director, photographer, and whatever else needed to be done.

Mr. Bihun is no stranger to journalism. He has worked in that profession since his years at John Carroll University, near Cleveland, where he was editor of the campus newspaper. After a brief stint as reporter and photographer for a small daily in north-eastern Ohio, he was lured to Washington to work in radio, for the Ukrainian service of the Voice of America. Ten years later he switched back to print journalism, with the press division of the U.S. Information Agency, specializing in African, Near Eastern and South Asian affairs. In his 15 years there, his assignments took him all message was passed to the President.

With the Kyiv Consulate on seemingly permanent hold thanks to Soviet intransigence, Bill became U.S. Commissioner, with rank of Ambassador, to the implementing commissions of the Threshold Test Ban and Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaties. He co-chaired the U.S. side in initial talks with the USSR and Russia on the safety, security, and dismantlement of nuclear weapons, which helped pave the way for implementation of the Nunn-Lugar cooperative program that has reduced threats from weapons of mass destruction of the former USSR.

Bill's arms control expertise became especially useful as the first U.S. Ambassador to Kazakhstan. In 1993-94, he negotiated with President Nazarbayev for the removal of 600 kg of highly enriched uranium (HEU) – enough for a number of nuclear weapons – in Kazakhstan. During this time Moscow was notified. A Russian minister reacted by saying it was impossible that the HEU existed in Kazakhstan. Moscow was told to look again. Evidently not everyone knew what had been left behind when the USSR dissolved. Russia did not want the HEU back. America then launched an ultra-secret project in which dozens of U.S. nuclear technicians lived for a month in cold, wind-swept Ust-Kamenogorsk near the Chinese border to pack the HEU and prepare it for shipment. Four U.S. Air Force C-5s then flew it half-way around the world non-stop (with multiple air-to-air refuelings). The HEU arrived at the U.S. Department of Energy's Y-12 plant in Oak Ridge, Tennessee. Within hours, the Secretaries of State, Defense, and Energy held an unprecedented joint press conference to announce the mission as a success for U.S. nuclear non-proliferation policy.

One of the most poignant memories of Bill this author has is during Bill's tenure as Ambassador to Kazakhstan. In April 1992, as part of a Congressional delegation led by Senator Dennis DeConcini – the first Congressional visit to independent Kazakhstan – Bill was meeting our plane at the airport in Almaty. As I walked down the stairs of the plane, we shook hands and Bill said: "Remember six years ago when you, me and Andy Fedynsky first met at a restaurant in Rosslyn. Could you have ever imagined at that time that we would be meeting six years later under these circumstances?" Indeed, back in early 1986, few people would have predicted that the historic change that was to take place only a few years later with the dissolution of the Soviet empire would occur so soon.

Following his tenure as Ambassador to Kazakhstan, Bill continued to be an important policy actor in the post-Soviet area. He served as Ambassador to Georgia. Following this assignment, Amb. Courtney became special assistant to the President and senior director of the National Security Council (NSC) staff for Russia, Ukraine, and Eurasia. At the TWG Leadership Conference in October 1997, he was the featured luncheon speaker articulating U.S. policy towards Ukraine. In his last post before retiring from the Foreign Service in December 1999, Bill was senior advisor at the Congressionally-chaired Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe (Helsinki Commission) and was instrumental in ensuring that U.S. initiatives on torture, trafficking and corruption were included in the December 1999 Istanbul Summit of the 54 heads of the state of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE).

Since retiring, Ambassador William Courtney has been president of DynMeridian, a DynCorp Company. With annual revenue of $1.8 billion and over 250 employees, DynCorp performs technology and outsourcing services mainly for government. DynMeridian provides professional and technology support for national security programs. The company focuses on arms control and non-proliferation policies and programs, defense and arms control technology program management, classification of nuclear weapons information, security management and special programs, specialized information technologies, and safe schools planning. Key clients are the U.S. Departments of Defense, Energy, and State, and the chemical. Bill is also a founding member

Off-site Software Development: A Boon to IT Firms

by Luba Cehelska

The Northern Virginia Technology Council [NVTC], a membership organization of over 1600 firms, serving as the voice of technology in Northern Virginia, will hold a symposium entitled "Off-Site Software Development: Near-shore and Off-shore" on April 25.

Two NVTC committees, Workforce Development and International, have joined forces to create a symposium familiarizing IT firms with key components of the off-site software development process. The event will present examples of successes and challenges of off-site software development, provide an opportunity to ask questions of experts in relevant fields, and offer information about sources of help for companies who decide to do this.

Luba Cehelska, International Consultant, initiated the idea of the symposium with NVTC, whose members and Management have generously contributed time, ideas, information and meeting venues. Cehelska conducted three focus groups in December to gather topics and recommendations for the symposium format. Taras Kytsmej, President of the Ukrainian software development firm SoftServe, flew in from Lviv and attended one of the focus groups where he discussed with participants Softserve's offerings and capabilities. Softserve is moving into the Greater Washington Information Technology [IT] market to expand its US presence. Not only will SoftServe attend the Symposium in April, but it has agreed to serve as a Gold Sponsor.

Off-site development refers to development that takes place at sites which are not co-located (i.e. not in the same facility) but are distributed, perhaps in other buildings, or in another town, in another state, or overseas.

Software teams may collaborate across many locations, borders and time zones to program the software needed in the IT environment.

Today's technology makes it possible for software teams to be dispersed throughout the world and still succeed in developing a high quality product.

Benefits of off-site development can be significant, including substantially reduced costs, increase in staff more affordable, higher quality product, availability of highly experienced and well-trained staff and expediting product to market with software development, which is done both in the U.S. and overseas.

Ukraine is rich in intellectual capital and offers large numbers of highly trained scientists, software engineers, software developers, and network administrators. These professionals range in age from recent grads to seasoned veterans, are largely unemployed or underemployed, and are available immediately, for salaries that are a small fraction of American salaries. We know that they compare favorably with developers anywhere in the world, whether India, the Philippines, China, Scotland or the US. It is imperative that these Ukrainians become an integral part of the global IT intellectual community and demonstrate that they too are vital to the global economy. It is critical that they be included in the global community so that they too can participate in the wealth generated by the Information Technology industry. ■

TWG Member's Work Spans Globe Bringing People Together

by Marta Zielyk

Maria Rudensky Silver started her third overseas assignment with the State Department in July 2000 as the deputy consul general at the U.S. Embassy in Warsaw. She characterizes her job as the biggest management challenge she has undertaken in her nearly 12 years with the Foreign Service.

Besides standing in for the Consul General in running a section of 14 Americans and 35 Polish employees, Maria directly manages the immigrant visa unit, which has three American consular officers, and 17 Polish employees. Keeping track of what is in effect a big visa factory can be daunting at times. In just her first half-year in Warsaw, Maria has had to tackle a variety of new laws affecting visas, training for nearly all her employees and the always dreaded computer upgrades, which inevitably result in problems and glitches.

Her clientele includes all (legal) immigrants from Latvia, Lithuania, Belarus, Ukraine as well as Poland. She sees the many fiancées coming from Ukraine to marry U.S. citizens, as well as the numerous babies being adopted from Ukraine by American parents.

"...the most frequently seen problem with applicants for immigrant visas is lack of adequate financial support from the sponsor..."

"Some mornings our waiting room is filled with half a dozen crying infants, their exhausted parents and about an equal number of anxious fiance(e)s, clutching letters, photos and e-mail printouts from their intendeds," Maria says. "The vast majority of the fiance(e) cases are Internet romances," she adds. "All this is in addition to our other applicants seeking to join their U.S. citizen or legal permanent resident relatives in the U.S."

Maria's consular work in Ukraine was quite different. The Embassy in Kyiv processes only non-immigrant visas — that is, for applicants seeking a temporary stay in the U.S., either to visit a relative or friend, to see a tourist attraction such as Disneyland, to do business, to study, for temporary employment on a labor petition, cultural/scholarly exchange and several other categories. Warsaw, on the other hand, is the regional immigrant visa processing center.

Even today, travel by Poles to the West is much more routine than it is for Ukrainians. But especially during Maria's years in Kyiv — 1992-1995 — travel by Ukrainians to the West was still in its infancy.

Today's well-educated, solidly established and relatively affluent citizen of Ukraine has likely already

UESA Members Seek to Revitalize Or-

y Andrij Wowk

As we enter the "high-tech" era of 21st Century, members of the Ukrainian Engineers' Society of America (UESA, or Tovarystvo Ukraïians'kykh Inzheneriv Ameryky) are trying to make sure their organization keeps pace with the times.

At more than 50 years old, the UESA is one of the oldest Ukrainian-American organizations in the U.S., and one of the most unique, since its members come from all fields of engineering and other technical professions. The group currently includes about 700 members, organized in 10 branches across the U.S., with headquarters in New York City. The UESA publishes a technical newsletter ("Visti Inzheneriv"); has its own Web site, for use by members and non-members alike; and organizes technical and social events throughout the year.

Despite its long history of successes, however, the UESA must continue to keep up with the many ongoing changes in the world today. These changes are both social (the emergence of a new generation of Ukrainian-American professionals, and the "Fourth Wave" of immigrants from been to Western Europe and/or North America at least once. And Poles have passports full of entry and exit stamps. The difference in the economic standing of the average Pole and the average Ukrainian is remarkable, Maria says. That fact made, and continues to make, processing of non-immigrant visas in Kyiv very problematic.

The pressure to leave the country for a better life has only increased during the 1990s. By contrast the most frequently seen problem with applicants for immigrant visas is lack of adequate financial support from the sponsor, who is sometimes unable to meet the U.S. government's minimum poverty guidelines for bringing in a relative or fiancé(e). In most such cases, however, once the sponsor starts bringing in more wages, or obtains the assistance of a bona fide joint sponsor, the immigrant visa can be issued.

But working in Kyiv did have many advantages. Maria remembers fondly the close cooperation among the first seven or eight officers at the Embassy in Kiev during the winter of 1992. "Once," she recalls, "we all were driven by Charge Jon Gundersen to an event across town. You can only imagine the lines about 'how many Embassy Kyiv officers can you fit in one Volga!'"

There was the time that Ambassador William Miller, pressed for time to make a meeting with a high-ranking official, was stranded on the Embassy's second floor by repair work that had blocked the stairs. An ingenious Ukrainian employee quickly leaned a ladder against an open window, and the Ambassador was able to make a dramatic exit to his waiting car.

Work at the Embassy in Kyiv in the early 90's was characterized by high energy and a feeling that each day presented a host of opportunities to make a difference in the lives of people who had suffered tyranny for so long. There was a palpable feeling of euphoria in the first few years after independence, before the problems of grounding a genuine free-market, democratic society became apparent. By the time she left Ukraine in August 1995, the lack of rule of law, absence of true freedom of the press and growing realization that the average citizen is being taken advantage of by powerful economic players had begun to sink in.

Such is not the situation in Poland, by contrast. The country has a feeling of vibrancy from its large middle class. Societal problems such as economic inequities, lack of healthcare, and even growing unemployment are all tackled in a transparent fashion by a government that at least appears to be responsive and responsible to its citizens.

For example, post offices function efficiently and punctually, public transportation is clean, affordable and well-equipped, electronic financial transactions and use of ATMs are routine, and many (but not all) government office telephones are answered either by live operators or taped, interactive message systems. The Polish countryside certainly marches to the beat of a slower drummer, but even in the most remote village, some optimism for the future can be sensed.

With her very hectic job, Maria still finds time for her passions, which include skiing and dancing. Indeed, she met husband, Stan, at a contra dance at Glen Echo Park's Spanish Ballroom. They were married a few months ago at Holy Trinity Ukrainian Catholic Church in Silver Spring, Md.

On the TWG front, Maria Rudensky Silver is a long-time member. She was the first editor of TWG News back in the late 80's when the publication was in its infancy. She fondly remembers the many hours spent putting together the monthly issues on fellow TWG member's George Masiuk's Macintosh computer, and the many phone calls made tracking down obscure bits of information on TWG members, upcoming events and historical facts.

Ukraine), and technical (the emergence of the Internet and the digital information age). To respond to these challenges, the group has done the following in recent years:

- Created the UESA Web site (www.uesa.org) in order to keep members updated on news events, technical information, and branch activities.
- Created an e-mail discussion list (uesa@yahoo.com) to make communication between members easier.
- Sponsored panels on leading-edge technical subjects, such as on the Ukrainian aerospace industry (as part of the Synergy Conference in 1999) and on communication in the digital age (in November 2000).

Proposed activities for 2001 include additional technical and social events; establishing UESA student groups among Ukrainian-American students at various colleges; and holding "career days" for both students and newly-arrived technical professionals from Ukraine. The UESA leadership and branch leaderships are actively looking for additional ideas to make our organization more valuable to both its members and the Ukrainian diaspora in general.

For more information about the UESA (or to obtain a membership application), visit our Web site (www.uesa.org), or join the uesa e-mail discussion list (uesa@yahoo.com). For information about the Washington, D.C. branch of the UESA, please contact Mr. Theodore Kostiuk (6703 96th Place, Seabrook, MD 20706). ■

TWG Member's Recital at National Gallery of Art Called

by Natalie Sluzar

Washingtonians had an opportunity to enjoy a delightful concert by pianist Juliana Osinchuk at the National Gallery of Art on February 4th.

Ms. Osinchuk, a TWG member, performed in the Washington area several times before, receiving very positive reviews each time. The New York Times has called her a pianist of "superior technique, discipline, and talent." The Washington Post's music critic Joseph McLellan, called her recital at the National Gallery "spectacular," saying that in this recital, Ms. Osinchuk "avoided music's beaten paths and presented one revelation after another."

Ms. Osinchuk began her piano studies at age four with her mother. She had her debut at age 11, after which she became a pupil of Nadia Boulanger in Paris. She continued her studies at the Conservatoire de Musique in Paris, Tanglewood, and at the Juilliard School of Music where she received a bachelor and master of music degrees and the doctorate in musical arts. She made her formal professional debut at Lincoln Center's Alice Tully Hall. She was subsequently profiled in the magazine Musical America as a "young artist to watch."

It was her training in the French romantic school, lead by Nadia Boulanger, however, that was especially noted by McLellan in his review of the Gallery concert. Osinchuk began the second half of her program with the Washington premiere of a piece composed for her by Philip Munger, "The Fragile Vessel." It was here that Ms. Osinchuk passed a pianist's test of "speed, power and accuracy" with "flying colors," writes Mr. McLellan. This piece especially reflected her training under Boulanger. The two pieces by French composer and Boulanger's teacher, Gabriel Faure, Nocturne No. 9 in B Minor and the Impromptu No. 3 in a-flat, demonstrated Ms. Osinchuk's "sense of form and powers of expressive subtlety."

The highlight of the program, according to Mr. McLellan, was the performance of two short pieces of jazz-flavored works by American composer Morton Gould: "Rag-Blues-rag" and "Boogie Woogie Etude." Equally dazzling was Ms. Osinchuk's performance of the Sonata No. 3 in B Minor by Viktor Kosenko, a Washington premiere performance. Mr. McLellan writes that it was a pity that Washington had to wait 80 years to hear this piece.

Juliana Osinchuk has performed nationally and internationally in the major concert halls of New York, Washington, London, Amsterdam, Salzburg and Kyiv. She served on the faculty of Hunter College of New York City, and at the State University of New York at Purchase. Juliana Osinchuk currently resides in Anchorage, Alaska, where she gives concerts and teaches privately. ■ to raise funds for the procurement of musical instruments for the Lviv Conservatory in Ukraine. In December, we had a well attended and a very enjoyable Christmas Party at the Montebello Cafe. For the first time, we have instituted monthly social gatherings (TWG Social Fridays) where our members can meet, socialize, and network on a regular basis.

Some other recent very successful TWG events included an Opera Night at the Ukrainian Embassy, a TWG Tour of the Gold of the Nomads: Scythian Treasures from Ancient Ukraine at the Walters Art Gallery, a Jazz Evening, and a TWG Social Evening on Ice at the National Gallery of Art Sculpture Garden Ice-Skating Rink. In February, the Harry Watters Louisiana Swamp Romp, featuring music from New Orleans' Mardis Gras, performed at a "full house" Benefit Concert in Old Town Alexandria, with all proceeds designated for the procurement of musical instruments for the Music Conservatories in Lviv, Kyiv and Odessa.

By organizing and offering these diverse activities and functions to our membership, we are not only living up to TWG's stated mission but ensuring TWG's future growth, success and effectiveness as the largest organization of Ukrainian-American Professionals in the United States.

TWG Leadership Looking Forward To New Opportuni-

With the monthly Social Hour taking off and gaining in popularity, many believe it will continue to draw members and guests to The Lombardy Hotel every first Friday of the month (see p. 7 for more information).

"TWG Social Hour is a wonderful way of relaxing in the company of friends after a long week at work. It is also an excellent opportunity to meet new people and share one's thoughts and experiences with one another," said Olenka Gaponenko, TWG Member at Large.

According to Orest Deychakiwsky, Immediate Past President of TWG, "The first Friday of the month Social Hour has provided an enjoyable opportunity to touch base with old friends and meet new ones. Several newcomers to Washington have attended, and this has been valuable in providing them with an opportunity to meet Washington area Ukrainian-Americans."

Many TWG members also played an important part in coordinating the various events.

"Participating in planning the events was such a worthwhile endeavor! During the conference, Ambassador Pasqual's speech made an unforgettable impression on me. I became confident that the Ukrainian-American relationship is in good hands," said Gaponenko.

Based on her experience, Gaponenko also recommends future TWG conference participation for those interested in Ukraine.

"There is also much to be said in favor of the panel that dealt with building democracy and civil society in Ukraine, which presented us with three different views and was followed by a lively discussion. Frankly speaking, I am already looking forward to the upcoming conference next year and highly recommend it to everyone who is interested in Ukraine," she said.

Looking back at last year, as he mentioned in his message on page 1, Kotlarchuk said that TWG events also offer folks lots of fun, in addition to any historical importance.

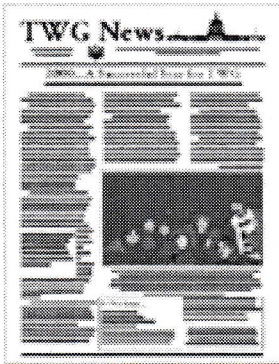

"In August of last year, we celebrated Ukraine's Independence with an Independence Day Picnic at the Sandy Point State Park. This gave TWG members and their families not only an opportunity to commemorate Ukraine's Independence but also to spend a fun day at the beach. Shortly thereafter, in October of last year, we had a very successful Leadership Conference, featuring the first public appearance of the recently appointed U.S. Ambassador to Ukraine, Ambassador Carlos Pascual," he recalled.

"2001 is off to a great start," said Andy C. Szul, TWG Communications Director. "We've got some very hardworking and dedicated TWG members. These are folks who have truly committed their time and efforts to making TWG the success it is today."

"It's exciting to be part of such a great team," Szul said. "Not only do you get to work with fellow Ukrainians in the D.C. area, but you get to work on TWG events that help shape how others view the organization." ■

i everybody,

I am finally writing about Mongolia and my travels getting there. Let me start pre-Mongolia. As you know, on my way over I stopped in Hawaii and Beijing. Hawaii was fabulous! I've been to Florida and the Caribbean, and although nice, they don't compare to Hawaii. Somehow the long Polynesian history combined with rugged coastlines, multi-hued blue-green waters, and rippling mountains covered with lush dark-green vegetation just struck a cord with me. I was only there for a few days time, most of which was spent in meetings, but I managed to see a little of Oahu, and to walk a good bit of Waikiki. Waikiki is touristy, but I liked it anyway. There are flowers everywhere and interesting and exotic birds, and...

And then there was Beijing. Hard to know what to say about Beijing. I knew I wasn't in Kansas anymore! It was my first introduction to Asia, and it sure is different. Nothing like walking down the streets and not being able to read a single sign. (Except in the Russian section -- what a surprise -- I never knew there was a Russian community in Beijing. They have a whole area of stores and restaurants. Imagine my surprise when I turned a

...OK. Let's get to Mongolia itself. Somehow all the talk of the wonderful magical qualities of the country left me ill prepared for what I first encountered. The city looks like a second-rate Soviet town, with ugly concrete block buildings, peeling paint, cracked and broken sidewalks, and the whole town is covered in a pall of smoke from the coal fires that the people burn in their gers. (The outskirts of town are comprised of ger communities. The gers are the round felt tents which the herders live in in the countryside. Lots of folks can't afford to live in the hideous Soviet apartments, so they bring their tents to town and live in those. There are even a couple of gers set up in the empty lot near the embassy.) The electricity goes out regularly, and hot water is a very hit or miss affair.

The other side of the picture is that Mongolians are wonderful people. They are shy, but also warm and friendly. Though many of them live in very hard conditions, they are mostly cheerful and helpful. They also like Americans. It makes you feel good to be here, unlike some parts of the world, where you know that people just want you to go home.

The food situation a few years ago was pretty grim, but since then the culinary situation in Ulaanbaatar has improved immensely. There are quite a few restaurants, including a couple of Indian, a couple of German beer pubs with steaks and schnitzels, Chinese, Japanese, Korean, Mexican (!), and even a little American cafe called Millie's.

The weather is very cold. It gets down to -40 C and below in the heart of winter. Right now it is around -15 to -25 C day and night. When the sky is bright and there is corner to see "Restaurant Moskva" in cyrillic letters!) Beijing is a city of great contrasts. You see young people in the latest designer clothes carrying cell phones, and alongside old Chinese men riding by on delapidated bicycles with their wives riding behind, and a box of groceries or a grandchild tied on behind the wife. Beijing is big and noisy and polluted. Of the nine days I was there, I could see the mountains outside the city only on two days. And I was told that autumn has the least pollution during the year!

It was fun to wander the streets, absorbing the sights and sounds.

The food in good restaurants is fabulous. I gained a few pounds and have yet to lose them. It's most fun to go with a big group and then you can order lots of dishes and everyone gets to try lots of different things. I ate all kinds of things, many of which were very tasty. I heard about some very bizarre foods, but did not encounter them personally. (Live shrimp brought to the table which you cook in hot liquid right in front of you. Yes, I eat them, but I don't want to watch them die before my eyes.)

no wind, it doesn't seem so cold.

There are also lots of stray dogs in Ulaanbaatar. You see dogs roaming around all the time. The ones that break your heart are the puppies wandering around.
